UNCLE TOM'S CABIN;

OR,

LIFE AMONG THE LOWLY.

BY MRS. H. B. STOWE.

CHAPTER XXIV.

It was Sunday afternoon. St. Clare was stretched on a bamboo lounge in the veranda, reading his paper, and a cigar.

His eyes were turned to the window opening on the veranda, closely secluded, under an averting of transparent gauze, from the out-gates of the veranda, and looking through in her hand an elegantly bound prayer book—she was holding it because it was Sunday, and she imagined that she was reading it—though, in fact, she had been only taking a succession of short snaps with it open in her hand.

Miss Ophelia, who, after some rummaging, had hunted up a small Methodist meeting within riding distance, had gone out, with Tom for the evening, and attend it, and Eva had accompanied them.

"I wish, my dear," said St. Clare, "that you would attend to your sewing."

"I would not trust him in a critical case," said Maria, "but I think I may say as much as becoming. I have seen him at three or four times, and he has been very kind, and I have seen him at three or four times, and he has been very kind, and I have seen him at

three or four times, and he has been very

kind, and I have seen him at three or four

have seen him at three or four times, and he has been very kind, and I have seen

him at three or four times, and he has

kind, and I have seen him at three or four

kind, and I have seen him at three or four

kind, and I have seen him at three or four

kind, and I have seen him at three or four

kind, and I have seen him at three or four

kind, and I have seen him at three or four

kind, and I have seen him at three or four

the floor, with their side faces towards them.

Three times, with her usual air of careless indifference, she glanced at the clock, and then, with a sigh, she turned away, and left the room, leaving St. Clare to his thoughts. "Why don't you try and be good?"

"Don't you try and be good?" said St. Clare.

"But you love your father and mother?"

"Never mind, my dear, I told you I

It was indeed a singular one—a brilliant and serene, and a single white jet of light, gleaming in the darkness with an evident eye to the contrast of color, and the arrangement of every leaf carefully of itself. "Why don't you try and be good?"

"Don't you try and be good?" said St. Clare.
